The Police State

Seven Points of Proof

Sam Aurelius Milam III, Sunday, November 24, 2019

- There are three categories of behavior in the United States: prohibited behavior, required behavior, and regulated behavior.

- If the government catches you engaging in prohibited behavior, then the government will punish you.

- If the government catches you failing to engage in required behavior, then the government will punish you.

- If the government catches you engaging in regulated behavior contrary to the regulations, then the government will punish you.

- If you refuse to submit to the punishment, then the government will initiate the use of force against you, until you submit.

- If you try to resist the use of force against you, then the government will escalate the use of force against you, until you submit.

- If you continue to resist the use of force against you, then the government will continue to escalate the use of force against you until either you submit or you are dead.
